

Rathbone Multi-Asset Strategic Growth Portfolio

Update, July 2019

Overview

It wouldn't be unfair to say that the US Federal Reserve (Fed) has been cowed by markets. Earlier this year, the world's most powerful central bank went from steady monetary tightening to the most accommodating it has been in years.

Yet it's not enough for many investors. They have a taste for lower interest rates now. In July, the Fed cut rates for the first time in a decade, taking the benchmark US rate down 25 basis points to 2.00-2.25%. A good number of traders had hoped for a 0.5% cut, so the move actually drove more market ructions. More rate slashing is hoped for, perhaps more than is prudent. We believe the US domestic economy is actually running pretty well right now, although its strident trade policies have caused pain in Europe and Asia. As for the UK, it continues to prepare for the Halloween withdrawal from the EU. Boris Johnson took the nation's helm in July after a leadership election that was, for all intents and purposes, little more than a victory lap. He has alternated between carrot and stick when speaking about the EU, which to us appears like he is angling for concessions and a deal. Whether he can pull it off – and, if rebuffed, whether he has the cojones to drag the UK out of the trading bloc without a deal – is yet to be seen. Either way, we expect to see some waves in sterling that the Cornish coast would be proud of ...

This month's trades

We bought UK Treasury 1.5% 2021 and UK Treasury 0.5% 2022 gilts. Towards the end of the month we reduced our holding of UK Treasury 1.625% 2028 gilts, taking profits after significant falls in yields. More profits were taken from ASML, a Dutch designer of machines that make computer chips, and from the London Stock Exchange. In late July, we added another put contract to our portfolio, which gives us the option to sell our S&P 500 Index exposure at a certain level. This mitigates the losses we suffer if the stock market slumps – the strategy helped us during the sell-off in August.

We sold the Veritas Asian Fund and reinvested in the iShares MSCI Far East ex-Japan ETF preferring to compliment our own favoured stocks by pure market exposure rather than relying on a third party manager's calls in a core market.

Outlook

All eyes are on US President Donald Trump's Twitter account. And, if you're British, on Westminster.

Both events have a bit of the unreal about them. We are so far into untested waters, so far away from convention and decorum, that it seems like anything could happen. And just as easily, anything that happens today can be unmade tomorrow. Deals on, deals off. Bargains and arguments. Fake news and embellished reports on Amazon fires. In the information age, some information becomes extremely valuable (check out the pricing power of the LSE and Bloomberg for their financial data feeds), while some information becomes less than worthless. Social media gives people the ability to share anything with hundreds, thousands – sometimes millions – of people in little more time than it takes for an impulse to reach their thumb. This has inadvertently created a pandemic of lies, a sort of global game of Chinese whispers that is distorting debate about everything from climate change to markets and government policy. We think it always helps to take a breath and have a ponder before throwing your two pence in. And it's crucial to do so before you make any decisions. There is an overwhelming amount of information flying around the globe today, so we try hard to filter out the hyperbole, the irrelevant and the downright untrue. We look to understand how the world is changing and what it will mean for markets. Then we can make informed decisions about your investments.

If we listen to every outrage, every short-sighted concern and every possible future, we would go mad.
