RATHBONE SICAV MULTI-ASSET ENHANCED GROWTH PORTFOLIO

MONTHLY UPDATE NOVEMBER 2024

The shock of a comprehensive Donald Trump electoral win has worn off and attention has turned to his Cabinet picks. A new cottage industry has been founded to divine Trump's likely policy paths through the medium of personnel.

The President-Elect is much more organised than last time. In early December all the main Cabinet positions have been announced and only three relatively minor posts of the executive branch were unannounced. Most require Senate approval, which takes longer than it should and is getting longer with every election. It could be deep into 2025 before the Cabinet is fully confirmed.

There are some eyebrow-raising choices, like WWE Wrestling co-founder Linda McMahon as Education Secretary and vaccine sceptic Robert F Kennedy Jr as Health Secretary. Keeping an open mind, some good may come from departments getting an infusion of completely different views. But there's also the chance of mutual lack of respect leading to gridlock or bad outcomes. We will have to wait and see. It's Trump, so it's prudent to expect some good, some bad and some absolutely wild.

The 3-3-3 plan

Perhaps the most important pick for investors is billionaire hedge fund CEO Scott Bessent as Treasury Secretary (the job currently held by former US Federal Reserve Chair Janet Yellen). While at iconic hedge fund Soros Fund Management, Bessent was on the trading team that "broke the Bank of England" in the early 1990s, by betting the pound would sink. It led to the unravelling of sterling's peg to the German mark. We won't hold that against him though. He's an eminently qualified choice for the top finance job and – coincidence or not – US bond yields calmed down soon after the news. Many investors see Bessent as a restraining force for the administration, one that could smooth the sharp edges of other members.

He has discussed a "3-3-3" strategy: halving the federal budget deficit to 3% of GDP by 2028, growing the economy by 3% a year through deregulation and privatisation, and increasing US oil production by 3 million barrels a day. Hitting these targets could be a tough ask, although Trump came close in 2018 when GDP was 3%, the deficit was 3.8% and 1.6 million extra barrels a day of oil were produced. Also, while the mood on economic growth has been muted, we really should point out that GDP has been rising at an average of 2.4% a year, including the pandemic years, since 2016 (it's 2.55% excluding 2020 and 2021). That's not bad, considering the lower-rate, lower-growth world we've been living in. The ability to juice growth further without refiring inflation is up for debate. Cheaper energy could be at least part of the answer but, once again, the US is actually already not the laggard it's made out to be. Since 2009 when US oil production started rising again, it has added an average of 530,000 barrels a day each year.

HOW SENSITIVE WILL US DRILLING BE TO THE OIL PRICE?

The oil price has drifted lower in recent months, helped no doubt by this Trump team rhetoric about boosting production. There's also the potential for calm in the Middle East and lower estimates of future demand given economic weakness in China and Europe. Interestingly, the difference between the price of US WTI oil and Brent, the international standard, has started to diverge noticeably. Since 2000 Brent has traded $3 a barrel higher than WTI on average; at the time of writing it was almost $6. The higher premium tends to arrive when US oil production is surging. With the price of WTI back under $70, that's nearing the breakeven level reported by the Dallas Fed's latest survey of US drillers, which ranges from $60 to $70.

In short, Bessent's 3-3-3 strategy may be more spin than real economic targets. But the direction of travel seems positive for the US economy: a focus on growth, tighter finances, less bureaucracy, more private enterprise and cheaper energy.

Meme discipline

Outside the Cabinet, serial entrepreneur Elon Musk and biotech venture capitalist Vivek Ramaswamy have been tapped to run a newly created Department of Government Efficiency (DOGE). It's not an actual department, only an advisory role. And one that allows for an acronym that plugs Musk's favourite cryptocurrency: the world's most valuable joke, Doge Coin. Yes, all the world is a meme now... Some have suggested that a non-Cabinet post is a snub for Musk, who has styled himself "First Buddy". However, the demands of a Cabinet post have meant businesspeople quitting the day job to take roles in the past. We think news that Musk was stepping away from his companies for up to four years would rattle investors in his web of listed and privately held businesses.

DOGE may end up being a marketing gimmick. Yet there are definitely savings to be had. Sure, many programmes benefit the Republican base. And there are entitlements that can't be removed, like healthcare for retirees and veterans through Medicare, a federally mandated health insurance scheme for the retired. But even in these sacrosanct areas, examples of duplication and waste on an industrial scale abound. Medicare insurance plans are provided through private insurers, paid for by the Department of Veterans' Affairs (VA) to the tune of about $10 billion a year. Yet the VA also runs "the largest integrated healthcare system in the US" – 1,380 facilities throughout the nation. Long story short, the federal government is double-paying for vets' healthcare, an industry where prices are soaring. The care is mandated, not the overpayment. There will be countless examples of this throughout the government. The only question is, will the lobbyists win?

The prospect of deregulation and less restraint on company mergers and takeovers sent share prices of American financial services companies sharply higher. We decided to take profits from investment bank Morgan Stanley, which would benefit from a greater pool of deals to make money from. We also took profits from small business e-commerce platform Shopify and customer relationship management tool Salesforce.

We used the cash to add UK pharmaceutical AstraZeneca to our portfolio. The share price was beaten down by allegations of corruption in its China business. We felt concerns over the impact of these allegations were likely overdone, giving us an opportunity to buy a high quality name with a strong drug pipeline. While China accounts for about 13% of Astra's sales, its biggest market is the US, where it makes and researches drugs in 17 sites across several states.

We also added to our holdings in US telecommunications infrastructure owner American Tower, UK real estate platform Rightmove and financial derivatives business CME.

As we write the French government led by Michel Barnier has collapsed after a vote of no confidence that united both the left and the right to bring it down. Barnier's three-month term is the shortest since the chaotic Fourth Republic in the 1950s that ended with a bloodless military coup by supporters of Charles de Gaulle. The opposition's bone of contention with Barnier's government is also the problem: an austere Budget that would have increased state revenues by €60bn a year through a mixture of spending cuts and tax hikes on business and the wealthy. The plan aimed to reduce the yawning gap between French tax revenue and its spending. By EU law this deficit shouldn't be more than 3%; it's on track for 6% of GDP in 2024. That's forecast to worsen and drive public debt from 114% of GDP to 124% by 2029 unless something is done. President Emmanuel Macron now needs to pick another Prime Minister who will inherit the same problems and, likely, the same intransigence from Parliament.
